Dear David Stawick,

I am very concerned about the new CFTC regulations that will limit access to retail Forex. This source of income is important to many and it seems that the regulations will force Forex transactions overseas – is this what we really want?

It seems that the new rules are being implemented to reign in financial organisations but at the expense of retail users – is this the right thing to do? I have read that Australia (and possibly other countries) have not suffered any financial collapses but they still have retail Forex – so I agree that we are not regulating our financial organisations properly but if other countries have proper regulation of financial organisations but still have retail Forex then why can't we?

Kind Regards,
