Dear Mr. Secretary,

It has come to my attention that the CFTC is considering lowering the leverage in retail Forex from the present 100:1 to a miserly 10:1. While I can see the large banking institutions, with the lack of oversight provided by the U.S. government, being responsible for the fiscal crisis plaguing the nation, and by extension the puny retail customers, I'm astonished that the CFTC would even consider such a move if only to destroy the smaller financial industry and thus force smaller traders completely out of the country. Is this by design? I know I will at a heartbeat move my funds outside of the country to more favorable nations. Heck! I'm even considering emigrating just to get away from the madness that's consuming this government. If the goal of the CFTC is to drive a stake through us all then by all means proceed but if any vestige of sense remains then this foolhardy idea needs to be buried immediately.

Regards,

David F.
